CANDLESTICKS AND CANDELABRA

THE modern employment of candlesticks and candelabra as a means of affording a pleasant supplementary light, as well as most attractive table decoration, has given them a very wide popularity in recent years. Placed about a drawing-room, and more especially upon the dinner or tea table, they afford a very becoming illumination, and give a certain effect of luxury and refinement to all social functions. In fact, no fashionable dinner or tea table is considered complete now without its candlesticks or candelabra. With the wax candles which now afford light in place of the primitive lamps of the Romans, they make a most artistic and pleasing addition to the table service.

The constantly growing demand for them as an integral part of every complete and modish silver service has prompted us to prepare this catalogue devoted exclusively to candelabra and candlesticks. In it will be found examples of approved forms representing the most highly developed and original designs of to-day, as well as unsurpassed workmanship and finish.

We make both the candelabra and candlesticks in sterling silver and also in Gorham electro-plate, and the variety of pattern and scale of prices we believe will meet every demand of the trade.

In classical antiquity the candelabrum, or candelabra, as they are more generally referred to in pairs or groups, were essentials of every household. They held the little lamps that supplied light for reading and for all social occasions where artificial light was required. Usually of a height that made them convenient for a person seated or reclining on a couch, they sometimes assumed very large proportions, and were ornamented in an elaborate and costly manner.

Candelabra were made of various materials. Some of marble were of great size, including in the triangle of the supporting feet that formed the base a space of six or seven feet. These were exceptional, however, and were mostly identified with religious or festal occasions. The "seven-branched candlesticks" of the ancient Hebrews were really candelabra.

Those of ancient times with which we have been made familiar through discoveries in Pompeii and other places are chiefly of bronze. From a base of three feet ran a tall column branching out at the top into two or more arms on which the lamps were hung. The top of the main stem was used for ornament, a statuette or group of figures, many examples of which may be seen in such places as the British Museum in London, the Metropolitan Museum and other museums in the United States. The form the decoration took, however, was as various as the fancy of the designer or the purse of the buyer. Some of the most beautiful candelabra are to be found in the famous old churches of Europe. Those in Milan Cathedral, made of bronze, are said to be the richest in the world.
